The main frame incorporates all the important buttons, the file list, the compression options and side-by-side windows for comparing your “before” and “after” files. The software supports batch processing, which means multiple files can be compressed at the same time. In order to select the quality settings, you must pull on a slider. Higher values result in less pixelized photos, but also, higher file sizes. The quality setting can be adjusted for each individual photo, or they can be applied in bulk, to all the images. Also, the output folder can be defined, while a suffix can be added to the new files before saving. A default directory can be appointed from the program's settings. Additionally, the software can delete the original files from your disk or skip the entire process if the output file's size is greater than the original. You can add individual files or entire folders to the list. Removing them from the queue can be done easily, but the app also enables you to delete the image from the disk drive at the same time. The software supports three output file formats: JPG, BMP and PNG. of ideas: the debate over the need for censorship. Students in an assignment about fake news must pick a side to present to the class, and some students have used both false and factual news to support their case. “The school has really tried to walk a fine line between maintaining a safe environment, while also encouraging open discourse,” says McKenna. “The school has actually been supportive in this — we were able to see through the class together and go through the process together.” University presidents must lead The current state of higher education isn’t without fault: According to a recent survey, only about 50% of universities are doing enough to make their campuses safe. But educators have offered some reasonable suggestions. “A lot of the discussion has been about the following or stepping up,” says McKenna, who points to examples such as President Trump’s May visit to the US Coast Guard Academy, where he said, “You’re not going to be able to solve the whole problem on your own.” At the University of Minnesota, president Eric Kaler has been forceful on campus security. He’s made an effort to hire more police officers and conduct more frequent crime sweeps.

He's increased funding for student life safety officers and anti-harassment teams, and he's pledged to allocate more money for gun buybacks. But Kaler still feels the need to explain to potential donors why a big increase in spending is needed. "Some institutions have talked about the importance of having more police," Kaler says. "But what they've struggled with is how to describe what we're trying to do and how much we need to spend in order to be doing the things that we're trying to do." With the inauguration of the Trump administration and the emergence of an emboldened gun culture, these concerns seem more timely than ever. A University of Minnesota survey showed that close to 80% of the students there felt threatened by their peers at some point in the past year. Such a feeling is a natural
