Most of us are familiar with the basic rules of cellphone safety—don't use your cell phone in moving vehicles and never put it in your pocket, for example. The most obvious explanation for these rules is that you can get too close to the phone's antenna and cause your phone to act as a transmitter, thereby making it dangerous to others and damaging your phone. But if you know these rules, you probably still get hit by your cellphone about once a month. Why is this happening? Because the rules we know don't cover all cases. Although you definitely shouldn't place your phone in your pocket while riding a bike or driving a car, you should be aware of some other cellphone-related dangers. For example, it's possible for someone standing several feet away from you to call you on your cell phone, even if your phone is in airplane mode. Why? Because your cell phone emits an electromagnetic field, just like a walkie-talkie. When you hold your phone close to your head, it emits a signal that can alert others to your proximity. In fact, most cellphones also broadcast an electromagnetic field when they're turned on. This field can get weaker the farther away the phone is from you, but it can also be more powerful at a short distance. For example, consider how much louder your cellphone is when it's in your car than it is when you're standing right next to it. In addition, the field can affect people's health, especially children, who are more vulnerable to the effects of EMF. Learn
